The INTERCEPTOR saga

In early 1960, Royal Enfield exported to the United States a special order of 212 enduro-style competition machines based on the 692cc Constellation twin. RE selected the name "Model 700 Interceptor" for this machine, thus marking the first time RE uses the name "Interceptor." Though powerful, the VAX-prefixed engines proved too heavy for their intended purpose and no additional units are made.

Meanwhile, RE was preparing a new flagship model to replace the Constellation and, in November 1962, the Interceptor Mk. 1 (or Series 1) was born. Equipped with a Lucas K2F magneto and twin 30mm Amal Monobloc carburetors, the Mk1 Interceptor sports a modified oil system and redesigned top end. Its 736cc, 52 hp engine reached speeds of nearly 115 mph (185 km/h). A Deluxe model with 12v lighting is introduced in 1964.

Economic and competitive forces in the domestic market prompted the Enfield Cycle Company LTD to restrict production of the Mk. 1 for export only as of December, 1965. After being acquired by Norton-Villiers-Triumph, RE re-introduced the Interceptor to the UK market in late 1967. But this Interceptor was a new model aimed directly at U.S. customers: the Interceptor Mk. 1a. The "Road Scrambler" featured aggressive styling with wide braced handlebars, a small chromed fuel tank, twin Amal Concentric carburetors, colling disks on the front hub, and battery and coil ignition.

In October 1968, RE unveiled its most successful Interceptor: the Series 2. Although cosmetically similar to the Mk 1a, the Series II offered a redesigned wet-sump engine with significantly improved breathing, and Norton "Roadholder" forks and front brake. Equipped with the largest and most powerful engine then available in a British motorcycle, the Series II was hailed as the world's first "super bike." A supplementary air filter housing, oil cooler, engine bash plate, and passenger grab rail were offered as options, complementing the ground-breaking features of this bike.

While the Series II was a success, it isn't enough to overcome competitive forces, and Royal Enfield closes its doors in July 1970. A stockpile of Series II engines was sold to American Floyd Clymer for his Indian-badged, Italjet-framed motorcycles. Clymer's sudden death in early 1970 left some 200 Series II engines without a home.

Thanks to the UK's Rickman brothers, the Interceptor lived on in the form of the Rickman Interceptor, which featured a nickel-plated frame; front and rear disc brakes; and a lightweight fibreglass fuel tank, seat, and air box, all mated to the powerful Series II engine. Only 138 Rickman Interceptors were built, but few would argue that the Series II interceptor went out in style.
